Latency of the First Look to the Referent and its Competitor

In this section, we compare the onset latency of first look to the mentioned referent and ambiguous competitor relative to the onset of mention. Latency is residualized for the total number of constituents the sentence contained.

The latency of first fixation indexes visual search performance, i.e., how long it takes to identify a cued object, and it mostly occurs before speech onset. Longer latencies imply that additional visual information has been processed before the cued object (referent or competitor) is identified. Thus, we predict that this measure will vary according to perceptual factors; scene clutter is known to modulate visual search performances (the more cluttered a scene, the slower the identification of the target, Henderson, Chanceaux, & Smith, 2009). Moreover, we expect the latency to be modulated by oculo-motor predictors in the same way as the last look prior to mention, or EVS (reported in the main paper).

As Figure 1 shows, latencies of the first look have a negative sign: both the referent and the competitor are given initial evaluation before the target is mentioned. This is in line with Brown-Schmidt and Tanenhaus (2006). The graph also indicates that the identification of a referentially ambiguous competitor occurs prior to target mention. However, this is a non-significant tendency only. The variable for Object (referent vs. competitor) was not included during model selection (refer to Table 1 for the coefficients of the final model).

Confirming what we found on the latency of last look, reported in the main paper, oculo-motor factors are key modulators of latency.¹ The more other objects are looked at after fixating the referent object, the longer the latency; conversely, the more other objects are fixated before the referent, the shorter the latency. We also find a negative interaction: the more objects are inspected before and after the first look, the longer the latency. Crucially, we find an effect of Clutteredtter:

¹Note that the latencies of first look are negative, whereas EVS latencies are positive, hence the difference in the sign of the coefficients.

Figure 1. Bar plot (means and standard error) of the latency of the first look to the objects of interest (referent, red; competitor, blue) relative to the onset of the mentioned target across the four experimental conditions: Animate - Cluttered; Animate - Minimal; Inanimate - Cluttered; Inanimate - Minimal. Asterisks indicate the predicted values according to the LME model.

cluttered scenes are associated with longer latencies, even when many objects have been fixated previously (two-way interaction FixBefore:Cluttered).

In summary, referent and competitor displayed a similar first fixation latency, but their identification was modulated by the amount of visual information available in the scene, and by oculomotor mechanisms active during scene understanding. In particular, the visual clutter of a scene delays identification, especially when other objects have been fixated prior to the first look on the referent or its competitor. This result aligns with the visual search literature, where it is shown that target identification is delayed for cluttered scenes (Henderson et al., 2009). More generally, we also find that oculomotor mechanisms have a prominent role in determining the latency of the first look. Their effect on the latency is mainly mechanistic, as they account for the quantity of visual information processed prior and after the first look. Such effects are corroborated in the analysis of the EVS (see main paper), and underline the importance of accounting for oculo-motor mechanisms when estimating latencies of looks, relative to word mention.

Table 1

Mixed model analysis for latency of the first look. The predictors included in the model are: Clutteredtter (minimal: $-.5$; cluttered: $.5$); Number of Object fixated, prior and after the first look (FixBefore, FixAfter). The random variable included is Participant.

Predictor	β	SE	t	p
Intercept	-158.38	60.67	-2.61	0.009
FixBefore	612.49	39.05	15.68	0.0001
FixAfter	-138.12	18.27	-7.56	0.0001
Clutteredtter	-297.6	74.76	-3.98	0.0001
FixBefore:FixAfter	-70.66	7.65	-9.23	0.0001
FixBefore:Clutteredtter	-162.02	36.79	-4.4	0.0001

Formula: (1 | Participant) + FixBefore + (0 + FixBefore | Participant) + FixAfter + Clutteredtter + FixBefore:FixAfter + FixBefore:Clutteredtter

Finally, we do not find structural guidance to be involved in the latency of first look. This result differs from the experiments of Brown-Schmidt and Tanenhaus (2006), in which the type of expression has an effect on the latency of first look. Possibly, the different task (communicative dialog vs. scene description) together with the increased visual complexity (object arrays vs. photo-realistic scene) made our sentences less likely to contain specific disambiguating forms, such as post-nominal modifiers.

Task Instructions

Dear participant,

Thank you for taking part in this study.

In this experiment we ask you to look and describe a set of pictures while your eye-movements are monitored and your voice recorded. There are no known risks associated with this type of experiment.

You should now be sitting in front of a computer screen on which you will see a series of pictures, each one preceded by a word that refers to an object of the scene.

Each trial consists of three steps:

- fixation point (please always look at this point as accurately as possible)
- word cueing
- picture presentation and description recording.

Example:

1. Fixation point (look at it)

2. Word presentation

3. Scene presentation and description

Your task is simply to look at the picture and describe what you see always using the given word.

This is not a story-telling experiment, thus please try to be concise, informative and base your description solely on what you see. When you feel happy with your description, you can pass to the next trial by pressing the RIGHT TRIGGER button on your pad.

At the beginning of the experiment, and once every 15-20 trials, we will run through a brief calibration procedure during which you have to look at a fixation point that jumps to various positions on the screen (this is to ensure an accurate measurement of your eye-movements).

Please try to sit at still as possible during the whole experiment, as strong head-movements might compromise the measurement accuracy. Should you have any further questions, please do not hesitate to ask!

Thanks again and have fun!
