MOTION MATCHING QUESTION

Why must we stabilize the image before computing the optical flow?

We are interested in the motion of the person relative to him/herself (which partially defines the action) rather than how the person moves against the background. Stabilisation works here because the background is largely constant green grass. Alternatively, one could detect the person against a fixed background model and then replace the background by a constant intensity.