Currency Reflections: The Legal Issues

Getting to Maybe: Currency, Debt, and the Pre-negotiation of Independence

The UK government up until now has clearly stated that it is not going to 'pre-negotiate' the break up of the Union. Yet to-day apparently the UK Chancellor George Osborne, along with support from the Labour party, is to rule out in advance a currency union.

In response the Scottish government has raised that they have a card to play: a possible refusal to take on a share of the UK's national debt.

So what is going on? Well it would seem a few polls are showing that support for independence may be on the rise. As a consequence it looks as if the no campaign that had adopted a

- Legally under international law the position is clear: if the remainder UK keeps the name and status of the UK under international law, it keeps its liabilities for the debt. The UK took out the debt, and legally it owes the money. Scotland cannot therefore 'default'. It can be argued that international law does, however, contemplate that on dividing, the two resulting states share out assets and liabilities equitably. However, it has no hard and fast formula for what constitutes equitable division. Tangible natural assets such as oil go with the territory they are in. But other matters – in particular debt - must be negotiated. What is equitable will depend on the overall result and context of the negotiation.
- It is not really in either side's interest to tell voters that everything is up for negotiation. It is certainly not in the No campaign's interests to tell people that Scotland has significant cards in its hand in any further negotiation over currency union. It is not in the Scottish government's interests to point out how little it can lock down and promise about the economic future – or indeed many issues - in advance.
- And instead of voting no, the people might simply decide to vote for 'maybe'. For on most of the issues the people care about, the secret no campaign dare tell is: maybe is what a yes vote could be if that was what the people wanted.
